In the next few days the changes became more pronounced. The separation of the muscle fibers due to edema was now marked. In places we found degenerative changes in the muscle fibers; some of the fibers appeared to have been dissolved, only a thin ring of muscle substance surrounding the nucleus; the striations were now indistinct in the fibers. About two weeks after the injection the changes had reached their maximum. The connective tissue increase was diffuse. The degenerative changes in the muscle proper had become more extensive. Besides a larger number of the muscle fibers and their nuclei were increased in size, and frequently double nuclei were seen in the muscle cells. From this period onward the changes became less marked, both macroscopically and microscopically. The hypertrophy of the muscle fibers and muscle nuclei gradually disappeared; the degenerative changes were no longer apparent. Finally, twenty weeks after the injection, small islands of fibrous tissue which had supplanted the degenerated muscle fibers were the only remaining evidences of the hypertrophy of the heart and myocarditis. The explanation which we offered was based on certain experiments carried out on striated muscle by several investigators. Eanke,² who studied the influence of tetanic contraction on muscles, found that muscles tetan...
